Pack 16 — Corporate Communication | Ref: P16-00

The standards an organisation communicates by, and the templates for the moments that matter.

WHAT THIS PACK IS

Most companies have no communication standard. They have habits, and the habits came from whoever was loudest early on.

That is survivable at fifteen people. At fifty it produces the things everyone recognises: decisions announced to some people and not others, a policy change that arrives as a rumour before it arrives as an email, three messaging apps where nobody knows which is official, and a leadership team that believes it has communicated because it said something once.

This pack is the standard, plus the templates for the announcements every company ends up making.

WHAT IS INSIDE

File	What it is	Who uses it
00	This guide	You
01	Corporate Communication Handbook	Everyone. This is the one you publish.
02	Writing standards and house style	Anyone who writes for the company
03	Email and messaging standards	Everyone
04	Meeting standards	Everyone, especially managers
05	Announcement templates library	HR and leadership
06	Change communication playbook	Leadership, during a change
07	Sensitive and crisis communication	HR and leadership. Read before you need it.
08	Channel matrix and communication calendar	Whoever owns internal comms
09	Communication health check	HR, once or twice a year

THERE ARE NO STATISTICS IN THIS PACK, AND THAT IS DELIBERATE

You will not find "studies show that 70 per cent of employees" anywhere in here.

Communication material is the worst offender in the template market for confident numbers nobody can trace. Most of them are repeated from other articles that were repeating something else.

Everything in this pack argues from reasoning you can test against your own experience of your own company. That is more persuasive than a borrowed statistic and it does not go out of date.

Corporate Communication Handbook

Pack 16 — Corporate Communication | Ref: P16-01

The standard. This is the document you publish to the organisation.

Adapt the bracketed parts, delete what does not apply, and publish it under your own name. It is written to be read by everyone, not just by HR.

WHY WE HAVE THIS

As a company grows, the thing that breaks first is not strategy or process. It is who knew what, and when.

This handbook sets out how we communicate at [Company]: what we tell people, how quickly, through which channel, and what we expect of each other in return. It exists so that nobody has to guess.

OUR PRINCIPLES

Principle	What it means in practice
Say it once, say it properly	A decision is announced in full, in one place, by the person accountable for it. Not trailed in a meeting, half-mentioned in a group chat, and formalised a week later.
The people affected hear it first	Never from a rumour, never from a client, never from a LinkedIn post. If we cannot tell them first, we are not ready to announce.
Bad news travels fastest	We tell people difficult things early and directly. Delay does not soften bad news, it only adds the discovery that we knew and did not say.
Say what you do not know	"We have not decided yet and we will tell you by Friday" is a complete answer. Silence is not.
Write so it can be read once	Clarity is a courtesy. If a message needs to be read three times, it was not finished.
Disagree in the room	Decisions are discussed openly and supported publicly once made. If you disagree, say so before the decision, not afterwards in a side channel.

THE PRINCIPLE PEOPLE REMEMBER

The people affected hear it first.

Almost every serious internal communication failure is a version of this one being broken. Someone learned that their team was restructuring, their manager was leaving, or their project was cancelled, from a conversation they were not meant to overhear.

That is the damage you spend a year repairing. Everything else in this handbook is easier to recover from.

WHO SAYS WHAT

Type of news	Who announces it	To whom, first
Company strategy or direction	[Founder or CEO]	Everyone, at the same time

Organisational change or restructuring	[Founder]	Those directly affected, individually, first
Policy change	[HR]	Managers briefed first, then everyone
A person joining	[Hiring manager or HR]	Their team, then the company
A person leaving	[Their manager]	Their team first, always
A promotion or role change	[Their manager]	The person, then their team
Client or commercial news	[Function head]	Those who work on it
An incident or crisis	[Founder, with HR]	See file 07 before anything is sent

WHICH CHANNEL FOR WHAT

[Replace these with your actual tools.]

Channel	Use it for	Do not use it for
Email	Anything that is a record: policy, offers, formal notice, anything someone may need to find in six months	Urgent things. People do not read email fast.
[Chat tool]	Day to day coordination, quick questions, informal updates	Decisions, bad news, anything sensitive, anything that must be found later
All hands	Strategy, results, change, anything where people need to see a face and ask questions	Routine updates that could have been written
One to one	Anything about one person: performance, pay, role, exit, concerns	Anything the whole team needs to hear equally
[Notice board or intranet]	Policies, statutory notices, reference material	Announcements. Nobody checks it unprompted.

THE RULE THAT PREVENTS THE MOST DAMAGE

Nothing about one person goes in a group channel. Not a performance comment, not a reason for an exit, not a correction, not a joke at their expense.

If it is about a person, it is a conversation with that person.

WHAT WE EXPECT OF EVERYONE

- Respond within [one working day] even if the response is "I have seen this, I will come back to you by Thursday"
- Use the channel the message came in on unless it needs to become a record, in which case move it to email and say you are doing so
- Do not escalate before you have asked take it to the person first. Most things are a misunderstanding and stop there.
- Do not discuss colleagues in channels they are not in
